Top Five Myths About Immigrants

Facilitated by Charles Gallagher, Ph.D., Chair, Sociology and Criminal Justice Department

Wednesday, March 14, 3:00 p.m.
Holroyd Atrium. Free Food.

About 40 million Americans are foreign born, the majority of which have arrived in the last few decades. Between 2000 and 2006 the Philadelphia metro area’s immigrant population grew by 113,000, re-emerging as a portal destination for groups overwhelmingly coming from Asia and Latin America, with India and Mexico being respectively the largest sending countries moving Philadelphia up in rank to the fifth largest city in the United States.

What does this most recent wave of immigration mean for the native born Americans?
Are the stories we hear on the radio, television or at the dinner table true?
What is fact and what is fiction concerning trends in immigration?

Explorer Cafés are every Wednesday at 3:00 p.m.

In Service to the Nation:
Arts and Crafts and the Military

In the 20th century, the American military incorporated the use of crafts in two major service areas: beginning with WWI as a tool for rehabilitating wounded soldiers and veterans through occupational therapy and vocational training, and since WWII as a leisure and recreational activity promoting a sense of well being and efficacy. Arts and crafts making and other forms of creative expression have also helped veterans of war and combat following separation from service. This presentation briefly documents such creative initiatives as the WWII era Red Cross Arts and Skills program, crafts and writing projects for Vietnam veterans, and the myriad forms of arts and crafts making for both healing and well being developed by today’s Iraq and Afghanistan veterans, including the Combat Paper Project.

Tara Leigh Tappert, Ph.D.

Tappert’s current scholarship focuses on 20th-century American craft, with recent work on arts and crafts and the military funded in 2010 by a research grant from the Center for Craft, Creativity, and Design. Since 1990, she has been a team member for the exhibition series documenting the history of 20th-century American craft sponsored by the Museum of Arts and Design in New York City. Tara holds a Ph.D. in American Studies from the George Washington University.
